Every year more than 10 million people die unnecessarily from consuming tobacco, alcohol, and sugary beverages. Evidence demonstrates that health taxes are one of the most effective ways to reduce the consumption of unhealthy products, ideally as part of a strategic public health approach. To consider how to best accelerate the implementation of health taxes, the Alliance for Health Policy and Systems Research, together with the World Health Organization, the Governments of Norway and Tonga, the NCD Alliance and Bloomberg Philanthropies, is convening a short lunch-time discussion on the sidelines of the 2025 World Health Assembly to consider:

- What are the barriers for policymakers to accelerate health taxes implementation?
- How can health research and learning help overcome these barriers?
- How can global institutions and agencies best support the effective implementation of health taxes?
